Glover Commands President's Lecture Series

Dr. Maggie Glover addressing the campus community.

Dr. Maggie Glover, the first and only African-American woman to serve in the South Carolina State Senate and the current director of Developmental Programs and Special Activities at Morris College, addressed the campus community on Thursday at the President's Lecture Series.

Earning a standing ovation, Dr. Glover delivered a timely and articulate message for students to awaken and seize the opportunity to prepare for their futures.

She spoke of the privilege of being an adult, being enrolled in higher education, and the responsibility that comes with those privileges. She cautioned, "This is a global society that will not accept mediocrity. You are here to acquire the skills you need to succeed."

Detailing the expectations of corporate society and the world of employment, Dr. Glover clarified that those expectations include mannerisms, appearance, communication skills, and self-respect. "Life has regulations, rules and policies that you are required to follow. You owe life; life does not owe you. Be a role model for someone else to follow."

She acknowledged that life has obstacles but defined them as "temporary impeding blocks that are to be moved around, overcome, or ignored. Pointing to the career path and slogan of President Barack Obama, she added, "Whatever it is you want out of this life- 'You Can.'"

In his closing remarks, President Richardson thanked Dr. Glover "for a very profound message. We are blessed to have you here at Morris College."
