Leach Challenges Students to be Agents of Change

Assistant Superintendent of Schools for the Sumter County School District, Dr. Cornelius Leach, spoke at Thursday's American Education Week Assembly. He addressed the national theme, "Great Public Schools: A Basic Right and Responsibility."

Leach brings a background of more than 17 years of experience in public school education to the dialogue as well as his recent collaborations with educators in China when discussing our responsibilities in public education.

Assessing the similarities and differences in the two educational systems, Leach acknowledged that students in China spend more hours in the day in school, yet approximately the same number of calendar months in the classroom. However, he explained students in China are not privileged to free education after the ninth grade.

He surmised that much of what can make the difference in public education is our perspective on the challenges as well as how we choose to address them.

Leach asked the question, "What is our responsibility in improving public education?" He answered character education and mentoring students. He clarified that character education can provide the basic principles of trust, fairness, discipline, citizenship, and diligence that many students are not learning at home. He went on to say that these character traits are essential in achieving success in the classroom and in the world of employment.

Leach urged Morris College students to be mentors to students in the public school system. He stated as college students, "You have successfully navigated K-12 education. You know what is required to succeed in college. This is the real perspective students in public school need." He said, "You are the change agents for our school system."

In closing remarks, President Richardson commended Leach for his thought-provoking and inspiring message and he urged students to remember Dr. Leach's call to them to be agents of change.
